Consider these facts:

- As of 2005, African Americans represented 12 percent of the total population of drug users, but 34 percent of those arrested for drug offenses, and 45 percent of those in state prison for a drug offense. (Sentencing Project)

- In 2005, African Americans in Illinois were 9.1 times more likely than whites to be jailed or imprisoned, ranking Illinois fourteenth worst in the nation in terms of racial disproportionality in incarceration. (Sentencing Project)

- From 1990 to 2000, the number of African Americans admitted to prison in Illinois for drug offenses grew sixfold, from 1,421 to 9,088. In contrast, the number of whites admitted to prison for drug offenses remained relatively stable. (Lurigio)

Statistics such as these are not new, but we cannot allow them to be numbing. They represent an uneven administration of justice, millions of tax dollars spent on incarceration when better alternatives exist, and too many children of incarcerated parents growing up without the hope that their own lives can be different.

We know that the percentages of minority groups who come into contact with the criminal and juvenile justice systems at various points (e.g., arrest, jail, prosecution, sentencing, prison) are disproportionately greater than their representation in the general population. Contributing factors likely include, but are not limited to: institutional and cultural bias, poverty, absence or barriers to community resources, differential offending patterns, different decision-making criteria within both the criminal justice system and among service providers, legislation and policies, and accumulated disadvantage.

Racial Disproportionality in the Justice System: What We Can Do

Criminal Justice System Process Penetration Among Class 4 Drug Possession Defendants, Cook County Sample 2005, by Race

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Race</th>
<th>% of total who proceed to higher court</th>
<th>% of total convicted</th>
<th>% of total sentenced to prison</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>African American</td>
<td>39%</td>
<td>31%</td>
<td>23%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hispanic</td>
<td>23%</td>
<td>25%</td>
<td>19%</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>White</td>
<td>34%</td>
<td>19%</td>
<td>5%</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Help TASC Go Green!
To receive paperless versions of TASC News & Views, send your email address to Sharon Sheridan at ssheridan@tasc-il.org. Please include your name, address, and organization to help us reduce duplication.
With this array of complex factors, what can we do?

TASC approaches this question at three levels. First, we must explore and address the environmental and public policy factors that contribute to disproportionate minority contact with the justice system. Second, we need to examine decision-making criteria within organizations and systems that create patterns of disproportionality. Finally, we can work with people and communities most directly affected by disproportionality so that these statistics can be reversed.

TASC’s Racial Justice Initiative

For 35 years, TASC has worked to further social justice and equality by providing alternatives to incarceration and advocating for effective and equitable policies and practices within criminal justice and child welfare systems. This experience has culminated in the knowledge that real policy and systems change is possible.

TASC’s Racial Justice Initiative is a long-term effort to increase fairness for all racial and ethnic groups with regard to criminal justice processes, policies, and systems. This initiative uses research and evidence from a variety of disciplines as the basis for concrete policy and practice changes.

Policy. At a public policy level, it is crucial to examine federal and state laws and funding mechanisms that shape broad-scale trends in disproportionality. The population of U.S. jails and prisons has soared 500 percent in the past 30 years, not because of proportionate increases in crime rates, but because laws and policies have been broadened to arrest and incarcerate more people – particularly those with nonviolent, drug-related charges. Skyrocketing incarceration rates have disproportionately affected people of color, with Illinois consistently ranked among the worst states with regard to these disparities.

In response to these trends, TASC’s Center for Health and Justice, with

“Racial disproportionality in the criminal justice system undermines the fundamental principles of a just society, including the ability of people to have a voice in government, to hold a decent job, to safely raise and support a family, and to participate fully in the citizenship of our country.”

support from the U.S. Department of Justice, Bureau of Justice Assistance, helped establish and staff the Illinois Disproportionate Justice Impact Study Commission (see article below). In December 2010, the commission released an in-depth analysis of arrest and sentencing trends across Illinois and in Cook County, along with policy recommendations to alleviate racial and ethnic disproportionality.

The state commission was initiated by Illinois State Senator Mattie Hunter (D-Chicago), who has teamed up with other legislators to advance the group’s recommendations in Springfield.

Practice. Just as laws and public policies can unintentionally affect different groups of people, practices and decisions within organizations can also contribute to disproportionate justice. For example, the geographic areas where police surveillance is concentrated, or the ways that court cases are prosecuted and processed, or the criteria for defendants’ acceptance into drug treatment programs, all may disproportionately affect one group or another when viewed on a large scale.

As an example of how practices can be improved, the commission recommends that the criminal justice system take steps to more intentionally direct minority populations into alternative sentences for which they are eligible before resorting to prison sentences.

At TASC, our commitment to racial justice includes an in-depth analysis of our own data and practices. Having served nearly 20,000 people last year in courts and corrections, we are examining our own trends in referrals to treatment and client success rates to ensure our organizational fidelity to the principles and practice of racial justice.

Justice Literacy. Finally, and perhaps most importantly, the issue of disproportionate justice must be addressed through the lens of the people and communities who most directly feel its impact.

With support from The Chicago Community Trust, TASC’s Center for Health and Justice last year initiated the community-level phase of our Racial Justice Initiative. This entails sharing the findings and recommendations of the Illinois Disproportionate Justice Impact Study Commission and organizing constituencies to address specific issues highlighted in the commission’s report.

Additionally, TASC has produced a publication, What You & Your Family Should Know In Case You Are Arrested in Illinois, a resource that offers arrestees and their family members an overview of how the criminal justice system works. The document advises defendants of the consequences of the decisions they make throughout the criminal justice process, including the impact that criminal convictions can have on one’s ability to get housing, secure a job, and receive educational grants.

These strategies and actions represent some of the foundational steps in TASC’s long-term commitment to racial justice. We invite community partners, public policy leaders, foundations, and donors to join us in this important work.

Illinois Commission Addresses Disproportionate Justice

The Illinois Disproportionate Justice Impact Study Commission, a statewide, bipartisan group established in 2008 to examine the impact of Illinois drug laws on racial and ethnic groups, recently released its final report to the Illinois legislature. Overall, the independent study found that people of color, particularly African Americans, are disproportionately arrested, prosecuted, and imprisoned for low-level drug crimes in Illinois.

The study found that in 2005, the most recent year for which this comprehensive information was available:

- In 62 of Illinois’ 102 counties, including urban, suburban, and rural areas, nonwhites were arrested at a higher rate than whites relative to their representation in the general population.
- In Cook County, among defendants with a Class 4 (low-level) drug possession charge, African Americans were sentenced to prison at a rate almost five times greater than whites: 19 percent of African-American defendants compared with 4 percent of white defendants.

Background Papers on Disproportionate Justice

With support from the Illinois Criminal Justice Information Authority (ICJIA) and in collaboration with Dr. Arthur Lurigio of Loyola University, TASC’s Center for Health and Justice has prepared several papers that discuss disproportionate justice in Illinois and nationally. Please search for these papers at www.icjia.org:

National Scope

To learn more about the national context of this issue, including what you can do, search and download “Reducing Racial Disparity in the Criminal Justice System: A Manual for Practitioners and Policymakers” from www.sentencingproject.org.

Visit us online at www.tasc.org
TASC’s Smart Start Program Helps Parents and Young Children in Peoria County

In an expansion of its care management services for under-represented populations, TASC has begun a health outreach program for pregnant mothers and young children in Peoria County.

Funded by the Illinois Department of Human Services, TASC’s Smart Start for Healthy Children & Families serves pregnant women, infants, and high-risk children up to age five who are living in poverty. Through active outreach and engagement, TASC meets with expectant mothers as well as parents and guardians of young children. A first step is to assess family needs such as prenatal and infant care education, housing, transportation, counseling, food programs, and medical care. Based on these needs, TASC makes referrals to appropriate social services, offers ongoing reassessment and referrals, and provides advocacy to assist families in accessing needed services.

“TASC began in 1976 as a case management agency for people in the justice system who had substance use problems, and we’ve steadily expanded the scope of our services since then,” says TASC President Pam Rodriguez. “In the Smart Start program, our clients are not involved in the justice system, and most of them do not have substance use problems. But our core mission is the same: we’re offering life-changing opportunities for people who face big hurdles in achieving health and self-sufficiency. We advocate for our clients and ensure their access to care.”

Adds Christina Lykins, RN, supervisor of TASC’s Smart Start program, “Most of the women we see have not had access to prenatal services, which puts their children at a disadvantage before they’re even born. We reach out to expectant mothers to help them get services to ensure their babies’ health as well as their own. What’s important is that our services don’t stop there. We look holistically at the family to increase children’s and parents’ opportunities for health and success.”

To alleviate racial disproportionality in the justice system, the commission proposed several recommendations related to policy, research, and funding. Several bills stemming from these recommendations were advanced in Springfield during the spring 2011 legislative session, including:

- Use of drug forfeiture funds to address addiction.
- Standardized collection and analysis of data on the racial and ethnic identity of arrestees.

In criminal histories collected for employment-related purposes, prohibition to include drug-related arrests that do not result in conviction.

For a full copy of the commission’s report and recommendations, please visit www.centerforhealthandjustice.org and click on the “Justice Resources” tab.

TASC Earns Maximum CARF Accreditation

TASC recently was awarded a fourth consecutive three-year term of accreditation by the Commission on Accreditation of Rehabilitation Facilities (CARF).

CARF surveyors met with TASC clients, funders, referral sources, and clinical partners across Illinois. Their evaluation commended TASC for stakeholder satisfaction, collaboration, use of technology, and outreach in rural areas.

CARF International is an independent, nonprofit accreditor of health and human service organizations. To receive CARF accreditation, organizations voluntarily go through a rigorous peer review and survey process that measures fidelity to CARF’s accreditation standards and focuses on quality programs and services.

TASC has provided client advocacy and case management service in Illinois since 1976.

A limited analysis suggested that whites are more likely than nonwhites to participate in court diversion or probation programs, such as mandatory drug treatment.

“We need to change certain policies and practices so that justice is administered fairly across racial and ethnic lines,” said State Senator Mattie Hunter (D-Chicago), co-chair of the commission. “We need to divert nonviolent drug offenders from expensive incarceration to rehabilitation programs, such as court-ordered drug treatment.”

To alleviate racial disproportionality in the justice system, the commission proposed several recommendations related to policy, research, and funding. Several bills stemming from these recommendations were advanced in Springfield during the spring 2011 legislative session, including:

- Use of drug forfeiture funds to address addiction.
- Standardized collection and analysis of data on the racial and ethnic identity of arrestees.

In criminal histories collected for employment-related purposes, prohibition to include drug-related arrests that do not result in conviction.

For a full copy of the commission’s report and recommendations, please visit www.centerforhealthandjustice.org and click on the “Justice Resources” tab.
Health Care Reform: What Does It Mean for Justice Populations?

The nonprofit group Community Oriented Correctional Health Services (COCHS), which is supported by a grant from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, recently invited TASC to author a paper on the implications of health care reform for jail populations.

TASC’s paper was presented at COCHS’s national conference, “Health Care Reform and Criminal Justice: Rethinking the Connection between Jails and Community Health.” It discusses the opportunities and implications of health care reform for county jails, including the cost savings yielded when low-risk defendants with chronic health conditions are directed to services rather than incarceration.

Maureen McDonnell, TASC’s director for health care strategy development and lead author of TASC’s paper, says that ACA offers unprecedented opportunities for intervening earlier with arrestees who have substance use and mental health disorders. “Across the country each year, millions of people with chronic health problems cycle in and out of jails without having their conditions diagnosed or treated. With greater access to health care, we can interrupt these costly cycles much sooner. The result will be not only a reduction in repeat offenses, but enormous savings in incarceration costs.”

The paper discusses the unique opportunities of health care reform for jail administrators, county boards, and service providers, and explains how each of these entities can prepare for reform now.

Realizing the Potential of National Health Care Reform to Reduce Criminal Justice Expenditures and Recidivism Among Jail Populations (Excerpt):

As the front door to the criminal justice system, jails represent one of the largest catchment areas for people with substance use and mental health conditions, infectious diseases, and other chronic health problems. Approximately 9 million adults churn through local jails each year. Compared to the general population, they have disproportionately high rates of chronic medical conditions, substance use disorders, serious mental illness, and co-occurring substance use and mental health disorders. These conditions, which contribute to recurring criminal behavior and affect millions of arrestees, usually are untreated or inadequately treated.

The vast majority of jail detainees have no private or public health insurance, especially in states that exclude childless adults from Medicaid eligibility. Under the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act (ACA), most of these men and women will become newly eligible for health care coverage in 2014.

The ACA alone will not solve the health care problems of jail populations, but it serves as a launching pad for broad-scale system improvements. It has the potential to produce tremendous financial savings for local jurisdictions by reducing incarceration costs and redirecting eligible people from jail into supervised, community-based health care.

“Big changes are due to take effect in 2014,” says McDonnell. “When we’re talking about systems change, that’s right around the corner. This isn’t just an opportunity, it’s a responsibility. Every jurisdiction that’s been burdened with the effects of substance use and mental health problems among arrestees now has a chance to do something about it. It’s time to start planning.”

To download the full paper, please visit TASC’s research and policy site, www.centerforhealthandjustice.org. On the left side, please click on “Health Care Reform & Criminal Justice.”

“This isn’t just an opportunity, it’s a responsibility. Every jurisdiction that’s been burdened with the effects of substance use and mental health problems among arrestees now has a chance to do something about it. It’s time to start planning.”

—Maureen McDonnell, Director for Health Care Strategy Development, TASC
Illinois Association for Criminal Justice Focuses on Services and Policy

Until recently, Illinois has not had a formal coalition of service providers and researchers whose focus was on improving services and policies related to criminal justice. That void was recently filled with the formation of the Illinois Association for Criminal Justice (IACJ).

Comprised so far of more than 30 organizations across Illinois plus numerous individual members, IACJ is dedicated to reducing recidivism by ensuring that quality services are available for people with criminal justice involvement. The association advocates for research-driven alternatives to incarceration and reentry programs that save state funds, improve public safety, and restore individuals to a place of stability and productivity in their communities.

The association was initiated by a number of organizations and individuals with a shared commitment to improved criminal justice services and policies in Illinois. Founding board members include Allan Barsema, Northern Illinois University; Pam Rodriguez, TASC; Neli Vazquez-Rowland, A Safe Haven Foundation; Dr. Joseph Strickland, University of Illinois at Chicago; and Diane Williams, Safer Foundation.

For more information on current criminal justice policy issues in Illinois, or to become a member, please visit www.illinoiscriminaljustice.org.

Training and Philanthropy Leaders Join TASC

TASC recently welcomed two new members to its management team.

Jac Charlier, director of TASC’s Institute for Consulting and Training, served most recently as senior manager in the parole division of the Illinois Department of Corrections. Applying his direct experience in managing public safety–focused reentry initiatives, Jac manages TASC’s training and consulting services for local, national, and international entities. He is currently an adjunct criminal justice faculty member and has taught at Loyola University, Governors State University, St. Xavier University, and Roosevelt University.

For information on TASC’s training and consulting services, please contact Jac at (312) 573-8302 or jcharlier@tasc-il.org.

Matthew Smith, TASC’s director of philanthropy, has more than a decade of experience in not-for-profit fundraising, most recently with Goodwill Industries of Metropolitan Chicago. Matt is especially interested in the use of social media and technology to facilitate charitable giving. He served two terms on the board of directors of the Young Professionals of Chicago and is an active member of the Association of Fundraising Professionals.

If you would like to contribute to TASC’s fundraising efforts, please contact Matt at (312) 573-8327 or matthew.smith@tasc-il.org.

Remembering Noel Dennis, TASC Board Member

TASC Board Treasurer Noel Dennis, who had served on TASC’s board of directors since 1983, passed away on June 3. He was 68.

A U.S. Army veteran and graduate of the John Marshall Law School, he practiced law in Illinois for more than 35 years.

“Noel understood TASC from our roots,” says TASC President Pam Rodriguez. “Thanks to his keen knowledge of the law and his commitment to TASC’s work, Noel was instrumental in our agency’s growth and development over the past three decades.

“Noel was part of our TASC family for many years, and he was a personal friend,” she says. “We will miss him.”
Visionary Leaders Honored

More than 250 TASC supporters gathered in Chicago in December to honor two leaders who have promoted juvenile justice reform and alternatives to incarceration in Illinois.

Judge George W. Timberlake, chair of the Illinois Juvenile Justice Commission and retired chief judge of Illinois’ Second Judicial Circuit, received TASC’s Public Voice Leadership Award. A resident of Mt. Carmel, Illinois, he was recognized for his commitment to addressing the distinct and multiple challenges facing adolescents in the justice system.

Melody M. Heaps, founder of Illinois TASC and the agency’s president from 1976 to 2009, received TASC’s Justice Leadership Award. Congressman Danny K. Davis (D-Chicago) praised TASC’s leadership team and introduced Heaps as “one of the most visionary persons I have ever encountered.” In accepting the award, she conveyed her passion for building systems that address addiction as a public health issue and public policies that confront the disproportionate incarceration of people of color.

Speaking from personal experience, TASC case manager Antanya Knapp said she knew years ago that she wanted to work for TASC one day, since it was TASC that had helped turn her mother’s life around. Knapp described the confusing and frightening experiences that she and her young siblings faced when her mother was actively using drugs. Once her mother was sent to TASC and began her path to recovery, “from that point on, all the memories were positive.”

Thank You to Our Donors and Volunteers!

We would like to thank the following donors who provided exceptional support to TASC’s 2010 Leadership Awards campaign:

Patrons
Reckitt Benckiser Group plc
Pamela F. Rodriguez

Friends of Honorees
Healthcare Alternative Systems (HAS)
Randolph E. and Elizabeth Cloud

Supporters
AFSCME–IL Council No. 31
B2B Computer Products
Better Business Planning, Inc.
Clifton Gunderson LLP
Jim Durkan
Roy and Mary Fesmire
John K. Greene
Harris, N.A.

Melody M. Heaps
Barbara Hillman
Bruce and Anne Hunt
Marcia J. Liptez, PhD
Peter and Lisa Palanca
RGMA, Inc.
Rosecrance Health Network
Sue Thau
Barbara Frazin Weiner,
Bruno & Weiner
George A. H. Williams

Additional thanks to Ashland Addison Florist Company, Boris Uk of Uk Studio, Inc., and North Shore Printers for contributing flowers, photography, and printing services to the event.
SAVE THE DATE:
TASC 2011 Leadership Awards Luncheon
Tuesday, December 6
Westin Michigan Avenue Chicago

If you would like to support TASC or contribute raffle prizes, please contact Matthew Smith, TASC philanthropy director, at (312) 573-8327 or matthew.smith@tasc-il.org